Hild | Nicola Griffith

"Hild" is Nicola Griffith's imagining of the first part of the life of St. Hilda, a Seventh Century convert to Christianity and an early saint. She was said to have been King Edwin's seer, and in Griffith's telling, she is a precocious, gifted observer of people and extremely talented at pattern recognition, which would go a long way toward explaining her gifts.

Late on the night before the election I finished the first draft of Menewood. It is a monster! I've been working on this for a while. I wrote the first chapter in 2014 but then got distracted by many things: my health, three tours and consequent rounds of publicity for Hild (US, UK, US again) other projects like gender bias in literary prizes, and #CripLit, doing a PhD, writing another novel ...

Hild barely emerges as a fully rounded character. She should be fascinating, but she comes across as annoying. The minor characters are more vividly drawn. Nicola Griffith has done admirable research, but the story has little pace and intermittent excitement. Yet there is something compelling about her style which keeps drawing me back.
